

Members of the Teen Squad visited the campus of the Chicago School of Professional Psychology where they conducted a Leader to Leader Interview with a panel of talented women. The panel consisted of five diverse women who shared different aspects of the field of psychology with the girls. The women shared their perspectives on The Chicago School's community atmosphere, how each came to be in their current positions, and what it takes to become a psychologist.

Thoughts from the Teen Squad about the Leader to Leader Interview

"I would like to visit The Chicago School of Professional Psychology again!"

"The interview made me think more about what options I have for a career."

"I liked how the panelists all came from different areas of the field."

Leader to Leader Interview
Chicago School of Professional Psychology

During this event, the teens got to know the women better by starting off with the "Name Game" where the group took turns saying their name and stating what each hoped to get out of this unique opportunity to interview each other. The teens had a great time asking the panel about the school and each of their jobs. The women also had a chance to ask questions of the teens, which turned into a thoughtful discussion about the girls' experiences with Girls in the Game and their plans for the future. Before the interview ended, the teens shared different statistics about girls' health and sports equity issues. The women were not easily stumped in the "True or False" game, as they are familiar with these issues in their work. Thanks to everyone who participated in such a wonderful Leader to Leader Interview.
